No doubt the "fair women" and "brave men" chased "the glowing hours with flying feet" with as much pleasure as in marble halls, and it is quite certain that, though the exact location of their revelry may have been forgotten, the occasion itself will be preserved to all time by Byron's lines.

A stanza, not as often quoted as that with which the poet opens the brilliant scene, and which is not less beautiful, describing the battle-field, the carnage and the dead, is as follows: Last noon beheld them full of lusty life, Last eve in beauty's circle proudly gay: The midnight brought the signal-sound of strife,
